Banking Markets in the Twelfth Federal Reserve District

August 2007

INTRODUCTION

The policy of the Economic Research Department of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco (Research) is that the banking markets relevant to any proposed banking transaction are best defined with regard to the specifics of that proposal. Accordingly, Research does not maintain a comprehensive list of predefined banking markets in the Twelfth Federal Reserve District. Instead, as a guide to applicants and other interested parties, Research provides this document establishing certain principles used by Research to define banking markets in the Twelfth Federal Reserve District. (The Twelfth District covers the states of Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, and Washington, as well as certain Pacific Island territories.)

In general, a local banking market is an economically integrated area within which competitive forces ensure that prices (such as interest rates and fees) charged by suppliers of banking services are quickly and materially influenced by the actions of other suppliers in that area. At a minimum, a local market is an area within which banking customers can practicably turn for alternative banking services when faced with unfavorable prices.

As a convenience to applicants, and as an illustration of the principles contained herein, an appendix to this document lists markets that have been used by Research in previous cases. The definitions of these markets are for guidance and illustration only, and are subject to change without notice as banking and economic conditions evolve in the relevant areas or as new information becomes available.

URBAN MARKETS

In metropolitan areas, Research relies primarily on market analysis performed by Rand McNally, specifically the definitions of Ranally Metro Areas (RMAs). For a banking office located within an RMA, the market generally is at least as large as the entire RMA. Urban banking markets sometimes may be larger than single RMAs. Cities, towns, or other communities outside of the RMA may in some cases appropriately be considered part of the urban market, particularly if a substantial share of the local working population commutes into the RMA, especially to the central city or cities of the RMA. In addition, these outlying areas are more likely to be included in the larger metropolitan market if:

- they do not have a range of retail, commercial, and other services (such as government, health, educational, and transportation) that would make them relatively self-sufficient, and the RMA is the most likely source of such services, or
- their primary sources of news and information (especially those providing exposure to advertising by banking organizations) are broadcast and print media originating in the RMA.

Research also may consider other factors relating to commercial and economic geography when defining urban markets. Proprietary information from financial institutions on the actual location of their own customers sometimes is considered, although most branches have at least some customers from outside the immediate local market.

RURAL MARKETS

Outside of major metropolitan areas, Research attempts to identify clusters of communities with substantial economic and commercial interaction. Various factors may be considered, depending on the specifics of each case:

- Direct evidence of substantial interaction based on commuting data, highway traffic volume statistics, or other information can suggest that two or more communities are part of a single banking market.
- If direct evidence of interaction is not available, Research considers indirect evidence based on geography, proximity, and travel conditions:
  - Geographic features that preclude relatively easy access between areas often create obvious market boundaries. For example, such features may include bodies of water that are not easily crossed, or mountain ranges that make road travel difficult.
  - Travel time sets boundaries on the size of markets; travel costs make it unreasonable to expect banking customers to travel exceptionally long distances for alternative banking services. Thus, the proximity of any two cities or towns, and the quality of connecting roads, is an important consideration in defining the market. However, the limits of what is considered sufficiently "close" frequently depend on local perceptions of the costs of travel and ease of driving.
- Cities or towns that do not have a range of retail, commercial, and other services (such as government, health, educational, and transportation) that would make them relatively self-sufficient are more likely to be part of some larger market.
- Certain unique services or institutions tend to attract residents of the surrounding areas on a regular basis, and therefore foster market integration. Examples include:
  - Educational facilities such as schools, colleges, and universities; regional shopping centers; transportation hubs such as airports or train stations.

- Local government seats. Specifically, economic activity in rural areas frequently centers around county seats, which often are the largest local centers of population and commercial activity. Residents of a county are likely to travel at least periodically to the county seat to obtain government services or deal with official entities.
- Areas covered by a common major telephone directory are more likely to have the degree of economic interaction suggestive of market integration.

As in urban areas, media coverage is considered, as is information from financial institutions on the actual location of customers, again with the caveat that most branches have at least some customers from outside the local market. Research also generally consults with local business, banking, and government representatives to determine local views of commercial and banking linkages.

DESCRIPTION OF MARKETS

Urban markets (those based on RMAs) generally are described as “the XYZ banking market, including all banking offices in the XYZ RMA plus those in the cities or towns of ...” Rural markets are generally identified by the name of some significant town or other geographic feature, and are described with reference to counties; for example, “The XYZ market, consisting of County A and the eastern portion of County B, and including all banking offices in the cities or towns of...”

A banking market does not consist solely of those communities listed as currently containing banking offices; the market area also includes incorporated and unincorporated areas without branches, as residents of such places must use nearby banking services and therefore are properly considered part of the market. (This point is most relevant when considering a market’s economic and demographic characteristics such as population, income per capita, or number of households.) Markets generally are “compact,” in the sense that any area that can be reached only by passing through a particular market is included as a part of that market.
